Hello friends, readers, dad? hello?

(Why not share a little inside story?)

I bought my first black Spanish guitar at age 17. After writing my first three songs on just the E-snare it was clear for me that music would be my number one priority from then on. With number one priority I mean; every decision I would make would be made in consent with music. You could say music was my including society. Including you from that, just want's the best for you. yes, potential danger.

Just imagine having a horse as a young teen and this horse takes you everywhere, to the most beautiful places in the forest and beyond. You talk to your horse, even though it doesn't say a word back, you have the feeling it knows you better than any other horse out there, and so you brush your horse and feed it apples and take it for a nice walk out, daily. Then on a Monday, when you start your new study, there seems less and less time for you and your horse. The fellow in the back of your class has something interesting in his eyes, and the way his hair falls, the way he looks at you, is getting more and more of your attention. And then on one day, when you get home you see that the door of the stable is wide open. You'r horse ran away.

I think what I am trying to say is Living with music is like taking care of horse while growing up, besides everything else in life that is pulling at you. I'm still learning how to drive my horse, where to live with my horse, so it has enough space to run around and be a horse. There were times my horse ran away, but somehow I always found it back, or it found me back. I love my horse:)
